2 overseas firms roped in to help PMETs find jobs

Companies in pilot have worked with govts of Australia, S. Korea and UK to place workers Jobseekers here will get help in finding jobs from two new placement companies appointed by Workforce Singapore (WSG).

These overseas companies will provide free help to professionals, managers, executives and technicians who lose their jobs or have been unemployed for at least three months, under a two-year pilot scheme to help place PMETs in jobs dundant last year, and have a below-average rate of getting a new job within six months.

The WSG said local employment agencies tend to focus on passive jobseekers, who are already employed but are open to other opportunities. The agencies are also employer-centric rather than jobseeker-centric, as they are paid by employers for filling vacancies, rather than for every jobseeker they place in employment.

The WSG sought to address this in the WSG considered since it began engaging potential firms last year.

Ingeus was founded by Ms Therese Rein, the wife of former Australian prime minister Kevin Rudd. It now has 10 staff here, who are all local and led by operations director Adrian Tan. An adviser from abroad will provide expertise to the team as it sets up operations.

Singapore Human Resources Institute president Erman Tan said placement agencies here have focused on recruitment because it is employers who pay for their services. There are other components which can improve the job matching process besides changing the recruitment model, he noted.

Logistics sector first to tap Attach and Train scheme

Industry picked because it is growing, there is interest from PMET jobseekers: Swee Say

The logistics sector will be the first to see a new Attach and Train scheme in which workers can join companies for training attachments without the companies having to hire them.

The scheme, which is part of the broader Professional Conversion Programme aimed at helping professionals, managers, executives and technicians (PMETs) switch careers, will “convert PMETs ahead of job placement”, said Manpower Minister Lim Swee Say.

Under the scheme, workers are put on attachments in sectors where growth prospects are high but companies are not hiring yet.

During the attachments, the workers will receive monthly training allowances from the Government amounting to between 50 per cent and 70 per cent of the pay relevant to the jobs they are being trained for, capped at $4,000. The employers they are attached to pay another 10 per cent of the salary.

The logistics sector was picked for the pilot run this year because it is growing and there is interest from PMET jobseekers, said Mr Lim.

When the Supply Chain and Logistics Academy (Scala) launched its career conversion programme last year, there were 250 applicants vying for 80 places, but there were only 43 jobs provided by firms.

“As a result, 37 of the (training) places were wasted,” Mr Lim said.

Mr Patrick Tay (West Coast GRC), chairman of the Government Parliamentary Committee for Manpower, was worried that these trainees would be exploited.

He said: “I am concerned that they are not treated fairly and are being used as cheap labour.”

Responding, Mr Lim said that the Manpower Ministry will monitor the scheme closely to ensure that employers do not abuse it. He also made it plain that the industry has to help the ministry select the candidates and find responsible companies to train the workers. “We are putting the obligation to hire (the workers after their training) on the industry partner,” he said.

Logistics firm Yang Kee Logistics is open to tapping the scheme.

Said its chief executive, Mr Jos Raaymakers: “At the PMET level, the hiring will very much be dependent on winning new projects and vertical expansions.”

Scala chairman Robert Yap said the scheme will allow firms to seize opportunities in the sector “without compromising their cash flow”.

Mr Stanley Lim, chairman of the Singapore Logistics Association, said that the scheme can help companies ride out the slowdown.

“Due to business uncertainty and the economic slowdown, companies are more cautious in hiring,” he said, adding that the scheme will allow companies to ensure that there are trained staff in the pipeline “at the right time as part of its forward planning for manpower”.

Other industries being considered for the Attach and Train programme include the infocomm, healthcare and biologies sectors, which are projected to see growth in the future.
